In a lush valley, there lived a fox named Rufus whose greatest joy was not the hunt, but his vast collection of golden coins. He was so set in his ways that each afternoon, he would lay his treasure on a sunlit rock and count it, boasting to anyone who would listen. "I have the finest den under the sun," he would proclaim, "and enough gold to last a thousand lifetimes!"

One day, a humble badger warned him, "Rufus, I heard through the grapevine that a family of fearsome wolverines is moving into the valley. They are drawn by the rumours of your wealth. You should hide your coins and reinforce your den."

Rufus simply scoffed. He didn't bat an eye at the warning, believing his riches made him invincible. "Let them come! My gold is my protection," he declared, and continued his daily counting ritual.

That very night, the wolverines arrived with a bang, tearing through the flimsy entrance to his den. They were brutish and strong, utterly unimpressed by the glittering hoard. As they scooped his coins into sacks, Rufus cried, "But this is all I have! This is who I am!"

The lead wolverine growled, "To us, it's just heavy metal. Your pride was your only true treasure, and you have already lost that." They left him in his ruined, empty home.

Wealth is a poor fortress when it's built on boastful pride.
